CARMEN

Carmen is a wanton Spanish gipsy, whose colourful character combines extreme passion with butterfly fickleness. Though only a worker in a cigarette factory, her dazzling attraction casts a spell over every man who sees her.

Bizet's opera opens in a square in Seville, where the cigarette factory is placed directly opposite the guard-house. At noon-tide the cigarette girls come out for a break, followed by the alluring Carmen. She then sings the famous "Habanera" deliberately trying to provoke the attention of Don Jose. Corporal of the Guard. For the time being, he is indifferent to her irresistible wiles. The girls return to the factory, and while Jose is receiving a letter from Micaela, the girl he originally loves, there is a disturbance within caused by Carmen, who has attempted to kill one of her fellow-workers. She is arrested by Jose's superior officer, Zuniga, and left in charge of the former. Left alone with the voluptuous beauty, Jose is no proof against her charm, and helps her to escape, making an assignation with her at the inn of Liliast Pastias.

In the second act Carmen joins in the revelry of the soldiers, toreadors and smugglers who frequent the inn. While awaiting the arrival of her latest conquest, Don Jose, she exercises her spell over Escamillo, a toreador. It is then that he sings the famous Toreador song to his fellow-revellers and departs with Zuniga. On Don Jose's arrival, Carmen hints that he should abandon his duty and join her with the smugglers. While infatuated by her fascination, he hesitates to follow her, proclaiming, nevertheless his undying love. While so doing, Zuniga, who has also fallen in love with Carmen, returns and orders Don Jose back to the barracks, but Jose refuses. Encouraged by Jose's defiance the gipsies disarm Zuniga, and they all proceed to the smugglers' cave.

At the smugglers' cave in the mountains we find that Carmen is tiring of Don Jose. While they are fortune-telling, Carmen reads that death is ordained for her first and Don Jose next, and in the face of inexorable destiny she laughs Don Jose is left in charge of the cave while the smugglers attempt to cross the frontier. While they are away Escamillo returns for Carmen and is involved in a desperate struggle with Don Jose. They are only separated by the return of the smugglers. Despite the fact that he has almost been worsted in the fray the toreador invites the smugglers to his bull-fight and then departs singing of his love for Carmen, who is attracted into following him, but her way is barred by the unfortunate Don Jose. While with dagger drawn he is threatening Carmen, Micaela, his erstwhile love comes to tell him that he must return to his mother who is dying of grief at his disgrace. For a short time filial duty overcomes his passion for Carmen, and he goes off with Micaela. As the curtain falls the glorious notes of the Toreador song are heard far away in the hills.

In the final act the scene is the entrance to the bull-ring of Seville. An excited crowd mixes in picturesque confusion on the stage, singing the praises of the adored Escamillo. Carmen and Don Jose are among the crowd and Escamillo sees her. He vows his love for her and she promises herself to him if he should be victorious in the bull-ring. Don Jose, maddened with jealousy, will not allow her in to watch the bull-fight and threatens to kill her if she should give herself to Escamillo. Carmen laughs at his persistence and taunts him obviously preferring death to his ardour. As shouts of triumph rise from the ring, acclaiming yet another victory for Escamillo, Don Jose, blinded with fury, stabs her.

The opera closes with Don Jose clasping the lifeless Carmen in his arms and crying to her: "Ah! Carmen, loved Carmen, no more shalt thou wake, but I love thee still."
